

American Council for Accredited Certification

Date

Your Name

Company Name

Mailing Address

City, State Zip

Re: Indoor Air Quality Legislation

Dear Sir:

Recently you received a letter from the American Indoor Air Quality Council explaining the Council's status as an independent certifying body with accredited programs that maintain high standards for certification of indoor air quality professionals.

The IAQ Council is now known as the American Council for Accredited Certification (ACAC). The Council's designations are voluntary and recognize both knowledge and verifiable experience and therefore communicate a level professionalism beyond any compulsory license or credential. All Council-certified professionals must meet rigorous standards for credentialing and must maintain their credentials by verification of continued work in the field and ongoing professional development.

As an indoor air quality professional certified by the ACAC, I am concerned that any legislation contemplated in our state be formulated with the assistance of knowledgeable and experienced professionals who are familiar with the specific issues and concerns relevant to our state. I would urge the legislature to include such Council-certified professionals in any discussions and/or formulation of any legislation that would affect practitioners in our state.

To that end, I offer my assistance to any individual legislator or committee involved in formulating indoor air quality legislation in our state to help ensure compliance with Federal rules and regulations and to assist with language and issues relevant to such legislation.

Sincerely,

Name of Certificant, Acronym
Council-certified Designation